according to their best knowledge, first time report in the medical literature in the English language, a case of Gardner's syndrome presented with gastrointestinal perforation and bleeding. This case report is interesting and well described and documented. However, the discussion section is too long and describes well known facts. Instead that, the authors need to revise their paper and in Introduction and Discussion sections they need to focus and describe in more details the importance of novel information (gastrointestinal perforation and bleeding in patients with Gardner's Syndrome) for the scientific community and clinical practice in comparison with the current statement in the medical literature.
