Abstract

BACKGROUND

Intra-abdominal hemorrhage during pregnancy is a rare and dangerous complication of pregnancy. In this article, four cases of intra-abdominal hemorrhage during pregnancy were reported, including the spontaneous rupture of uterine veins, spontaneous rupture of liver, rupture of external iliac vessel branch, and rupture of right renal hamartoma.

CASE SUMMARY

The clinical manifestations of 3 patients lacked specificity, and the bleeding parts and/or organs were not clear before surgery. All these 4 pregnant women were successfully rescued, while only 1 full-term infant survived.

The diagnosis of intra-abdominal hemorrhage during pregnancy presents many obstacles to the obstetrician. The bleeding is heralded by sudden abdominal pains followed by symptoms and signs of shock. There is little time for debate and speculation as the potential danger of severe sudden blood loss and resultant death make the diagnosis imperative and immediate treatment cardinal.

Case Summary	Imaging Findings	Discussion	References
A 24-year-old, primigravida woman was referred at 28 weeksgestational age for Doppler studies to rule out intrauterine growthretardation. She had undergone regular obstetric follow up elsewhere,including a dating scan which confirmed a single live intrauterinegestation with adequate interval growth. At 2 months amenorrhea she gavea history of acute abdominal pain associated with spotting per vaginum.Emergency ultrasound done elsewhere at that time confirmed the presenceof single live intrau...
