Mar 21, 2013 · A significant percentage of patients with paraesophageal hernia (PEH) will have a co-existing diagnosis of iron-deficiency anemia which will resolve following surgical repair. Between 2000 and 2010, 270 patients underwent operative repair of PEH. Of this group, 123 patients (45.6 %) reported a preexisting diagnosis of iron-deficiency anemia.

Discussion

Some patients with iron deficiency anemia have an associated large paraesophageal hernia and no other identifiable source of bleeding.1–5 Cameron's lesions are areas of linear gastric erosion that have been identified at the neck of the sac of large paraesophageal hernias in less than half of these patients.5 Several studies have shown that the incidence of paraesophageal hernia in those undergoing investigation for iron deficiency anemia may be in the region of 9%.3,6 The frequency of anemia in pati...
