SPECIFIC COMMENTS TO AUTHORS

This report describes an interesting case of sub-dialysis due to malposition of the peritoneal catheter tip. Regarding the title, I don't really think we could say a misplaced peritoneal dialysis catheter. That's because over the years there could have been a spontaneous trans peritoneal extrusion. This phenomenon is more frequently described in the ventriculo-peritoneal shunt tips. So I think the authors should discuss this aspect. On the other hand, if in fact the tip had been out of the peritoneum for 4 years, dialysis could already be very bad over those years. It seems to me that this subdialysis occurred more recently, which reinforces the idea of tip extrusion rather than poor previous placement of the catheter tip. During the discussion, the authors assume that the catheter was positioned behind the rectum sheath posteriorly and the fascia without passing through the peritoneum, so that the catheter tip was located between the transversalis fascia and the peritoneum for 4 years? Do you think it would be possible during all these years? In my opinion a catheter extrusion should be included in the differential diagnosis in this case

SPECIFIC COMMENTS TO AUTHORS

This manuscript described a rare condition: a sustained peritoneal dialysis with a misplaced extra-peritoneal dialysis catheter in patient undergoing peritoneal dialysis. This patient used it for more than four years. The reason of this case was analyzed. Please further describe how the necessary laboratory and imaging tests are used to prevent these cases happening again.
