So if we like the idea of peer workers, why aren't we seeing more?

Jacki Gordon, Simon Bradstreet

Abstract

The employment of peer support workers is widely encouraged in recovery-oriented mental health systems and services, providing a tangible example of how to translate recovery values and principles into actions. In Scotland, despite a long-term policy commitment to recovery approaches, the creation of peer worker roles has been slow and patchy. This paper describes findings from a study on the levers and barriers to the development of peer worker roles in two Scottish Health Board areas. Findings
