Abstract

BACKGROUND

Fiberoptic broncoscopic intubation is the gold standard for endotracheal intubation in difficult or compromised airway situations. However, oxygen insufflation through the working channel of a fiberscope is a controversial method because of the possibility of gastric distention and rupture during an awake fiberoptic broncoscopic intubation, despite the advantages of preventing fogging of the fiberoptic broncoscopic lens, blowing oral secretions away, and oxygenation of patients.

CASE SUMMARY

Here, we describe a case of cervical instability where we rapidly performed fiberoptic broncoscopic intubation using oxygen insufflation through working channel of the bronchoscopy to administer general anesthesia after two previous
