Impact of social isolation on behavioral health in elderly: Systematic review

Hanbyul Choi, Michael R Irwin, Hyong Jin Cho

Abstract

AIM: To examine and compare the effects of subjective and objective social isolation on behavioral health in elderly adults.

METHODS: A systematic search of PubMed was performed for original research articles from peer-reviewed journals examining one of the following topics: "social isolation and sleep disturbance," "social isolation and depression," or "social isolation and fatigue in older adults." Studies were selected following the criteria established based on the aim of this review. Data were extracted from the articles by two independent reviewers. Due to the heterogeneity in study designs and outcome measures of the included studies, qualitative and narrative analyses were conducted.

RESULTS: The set criteria were used to select a total of 16 studies for the review. Of the 16, 13 were cross-sectional studies. The characteristics of study populations were identified as follows. A total of 12 studies randomly selected subjects irrespective of
