Abstract

3 HIV infection among men who have sex with men (MSM) has increased to a drastic proportion throughout India in the last few years due to lack of efficient identification and management system. In fear of social stigma these men try to live a normal heterosexual conjugal life and in the process act as a bridge in spreading the virus to their women partners. In this case report we have highlighted two cases which clearly distinguished the efficacy of HIV treatment among MSM when they are diagnosed during early or late phases of infection. A thorough and voluptuous counseling to understand the psychology and sexual behavior of these men were found to be very important in both the cases. Our study which is actually a documented evidence of HIV infected MSM from eastern India renders a ray of hope among the marginally isolated group in India
