SPECIFIC COMMENTS TO AUTHORS

- In this case, primary hyperparathyroidism with elevated PTH level of 344.50 pg/mL was noted initially and reduced to the level of 26.35 pg/mL after the operation. What are the relationship and mechanism between hyperparathyroidism and spontaneous cervical haemorrhage of a parathyroid adenoma? Authors may describe these at the discussion of the manuscript.

SPECIFIC COMMENTS TO AUTHORS

This case report provides important lessons concerning difficult airway management for all anesthesiologists; warning of easy application of muscle relaxant for intubation and importance of advance preparation of sugammadex and various airway devices. However, time course of each of events is confusing. New figure indicating events in chronological order should be added. Patient's weight, height and BMI in addition of laboratory data should be summarized in a table. Is there sleep apnea in her personal history? External photograph of the patient's neck and jaw should be shown.
