

Dear reviewers,

Words in red color are my response to the point that reviewers brought up. I really want to thank all reviewers making so much efforts on these paper which made it better.

The reviewer pointed that it would be nice to contextualise “the core” value reported by the Authors in the Country they live. This could be useful to others surgeons working and living in other countries.

It is already mentioned in this article, in the era of rapid development of new technologies, young surgeons are more profound in understanding colorectal surgery, and the proportion of laparoscopic surgery is rising year by year. However, When treating colorectal cancer, the reliability of radical resection is always in the first place, the second is to minimize surgical complications. So we should not get lost in the tide of minimally invasive surgery and simply pursue the maximization of minimally invasion. The core value of the laparoscopic technique in my country is to ensure the high quality of tumor’s radical resection and less complications.

Again, thank you so much!

Sincerely,

Xin-Xiang Li et al.
